The History of Philosophy, by Dr. Albert Schweglér, is considered in Germany as the best concise manual upon the subject from the school of Hegel. Its account of the Greek and of the German systems, is of especial value and importance. It presents the whole history of speculation in its consecutive order. Schweglér's History of Philosophy originally appeared in the "Neue Encyklopädie für Wissenschaften und Künste." Its great value soon awakened a call for its separate issue, in which form it has attained a very wide circulation in Germany. It was undertaken with the conviction that the work would not lose its interest or its value in an English dress, and with the hope that it might be of wider service in such a form to students of philosophy here. At the very least, in simplistic terms, Kant was trying to reconcile the obvious facts about the universe uncovered by Newton with the dogmatic "we-can-know-nothing-about-the-world" attitude of David Hume. From an overall view there is no better treatment of the subject which spans as much of history and depth of works in one series. I do not agree with the author on all of his points but I find this series has been a very useful resource. It is extremely helpful to sometimes go over an author as a sort of review. Frederick Copleston's multivolume work, A History of Philosophy, is required reading for anyone wanting to hear a full description of a philosopher's system of thought. National research university, higher school of economics moscow, russia. Course syllabus: THE HISTORY OF WESTERN PHILOSOPHY (A two-semester course). Lecturer: Krister R. Sairsingh Class teacher: Krister Sairsingh. Course description: The History of Western Philosophy is a one-year course on the main philosophers of the western world. In this course we investigate the thought of each of the great philosophers in order to understand the main traditions of epistemological, moral and political thought in western philosophy. This survey of the history of philosophy also provides the necessary historical and philosophical background for courses in politics, law, sociology and in philosophy and the methodology of the social sciences.
