Once, while reading the poetry of Paul Celan, I had an experience I can describe only as mystical. It was about twenty years ago, and I was working at a job that required me to stay very late one or two nights a week. On one of those nights, trying to keep myself awake, I started browsing in John Felstiner’s Selected Poems and Prose of Paul Celan. My eye came to rest on an almost impossibly brief poem: Once, I heard him, he was washing the world, unseen, nightlong, real. Paul Celan poems, quotations and biography on Paul Celan poet page. Paul Celan himself was taken to a work camp and it was almost a year later before he learned of the exact fate of his parents. Some have suggested that his prose in later years became ever more cryptic and difficult to understand and that he was, in fact, trying to disassemble the German language. This fracturing of the language is more readily seen in his poem Death Fugue which endeavors to capture the full horror of the concentration camps. Paul Celan was one of the most influential poets of the late 20th Century, a man at war with his own language at what it represented at the time. He famously said that a poem was...

"Hands, the wound wooed by the thorn, bells ring, hands, the void, its oceans, hands, in the gorselight, the sail of blood is aiming for you."Â Paul Celan was forever traumatised by harrowing experiences during WW2, himself sent to a labour camp, but moreover the extermination of his parents which he never got over. His dark, broken and melodic poems have a kind of sensuous compulsion to go over and around these traumatic motifs and turn them round and through, and it has to be said sublime, though it feels brutal to say so borne as it was of such evident pain.
