Using textual media as its central reference point, this chapter works to reverse. this view. It takes its cue from a conclusion of one historical expert, namely , that "the history of education is the history of writing." This chapter looks at the. instructional pragmatics underlying this claim by presenting an example of reading. Education reflects societal values. And so we can think of education as a kind of leading or directing in more ways than one. And we can see similar notions in other words to do with education, such as the Germanic derived word learn. It comes from the Proto-Indo-European root *leis- meaning "to track or furrow", so the underlying sense here is "to gain experience by following a track". Closely related is the word lore, something that is learned. And similarly the word curriculum, closely related to the word course, literally means "a running", coming from the Proto-Indo-European root *kers- mean In a specific term, history of education as an academic discipline is also doing more than expected to ensure the sustainability and continued relevance of history in education. This was also an achievement recorded by a handful of practitioners who gathered at the International Standing Conference of the 1 History of Education (ISCHE) in Switzerland in the year 2000.Â Student, even government recognizes the relevance of history as a school subject, but no attention is accorded its promotion as an important school subject.Â But we may buy a book which tells us the story of a murder, and how a clever policeman found out the man who did it. Not a real murder, not a real policeman. However, a story that the writer has invented is a fiction. University subject profile: history.
