Comments and/or topics and questions for the thesis defence:

Martin Burget's thesis on the element of suspense in the films of Alfred Hitchcock offers to the reader a generally well-informed, theoretically-aware, and duly contextualized read. Burget has a gift smooth formulation, convincining argumentation, the text is clearly structured and touches upon a relevant number of films from Hitchcock's oeuvre. Understanding the role of suspense in Hitchcock's films via Burget's text is very easy.

However, there are also clear limitations to the selected approach. In his analyses the author rarely ventures beyond the realm of the secondary sources he paraphrases and quotes (respectable as they are...), and avoids the the much more taxing area of novel, independent, in-depth analysis. Moreover, there are other important elements of suspense creation that are completely ignored - for instance the question of sound and music.

The text is not devoid of some elementary mistakes in grammar, spelling and punctuation.
