The quality of an interview depends on both the interviewer and the person being interviewed. You only have control over how well you carry out the interview and no matter how carefully you choose your subject, you can't predict the worth of her responses. Whether you choose a semi-structured or structured method of interviewing, your main task is to listen. The interview is about the person you're interviewing, and not about you. Keep your comments on the answers you're given to a minimum.
