(2002). The teaching of psychology: Essays in honor of Wilbert J. McKeachie and Charles L. Brewer. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum. Forsyth, D. R. (2003). Various researchers, including Charles Darwin, made comparisons between humans and animals with the view that evolution was a developmental process and that distinct animal species were at different developmental stages of evolution (White, 2003). From human to animal comparisons emerged an interest in the comparison of adult and child forms of various species, including humans. Researchers were interested in describing which aspects change and which aspects remain the same during the transition from child to adult form (Dixon & Lerner, 1992).
