
The book elaborates on the connections between girls' and young women's bodies and images in the media. Underpinning much of this research, the authors argue, is an oppositional model of subject/object onto which bodies and images are mapped. Developing Deleuze's concept of becoming and exploring their own research with a small number of white British teenage girls, they develop an alternative model of the relations between bodies and images.